Leaky cauldron sign template

Sign

Submitted by: Helene of TroySupplies Green styrofoam Paper Pencil Palette knife (or other dull blade) Wood or linoleum carving tool Black acrylic paint Paint brush Brown or gray spray paint Instructions After deciding what the sign will say, layout the design using paper and a pencil. Make sure that the letters are large and easy to read. Cut the foam into the approximate size of your paper template using a blade. Please do this work in a well-ventilated area, since the foam will make lots of nasty dust that's easy to breathe in and hard to clean up. Lay the paper template over the foam square and firmly press the letters into the face. Once a rough outline of the words can be seen, dig out each letter with the carving tool, making a little trough about ¼" to ½" (0.64 to 1.27 cm) deep, being careful not to punch all the way through the foam. Once the words have the desired appearance, take a dry brush and remove as much loose dust from the grooves as possible. Using a dull blade, scrape away at the edges and corners of the sign. Remember this stone has been hanging for a long time and has become worn. Knock off the clean right angles of the foam, smooth them out, wear them down. A dull file can even be used for some interesting texture. Keep in mind that the foam will flake and shred, giving way to interesting planes to work with. Once the shape is perfect, use black acrylic paint and a dry brush to daub into the bottom of the grooves to make them more visible. Set the signs up across the room and have a look at them. Are the letters visible? Can you clearly understand the words? Cut and paint as needed to increase visibility. When the words and the shape are right, its time to add the texture. Don't forget that some spray paint can dissolve Styrofoam, so keep a light touch on the spray can. Working outside or in a well-ventilated area, spray the stones in your background color in short bursts. Keep the can moving constantly and the application light. Once it is coated evenly, allow the sign to dry for about an hour. Then, go back over the sign (with a different color, if desired) to add age spots, divots, and shading. Allow to dry overnight. The next morning, give the back of the sign a quick coat of paint and let dry. Final Product Credit © Helene of Troy's tutorial was taken with permission. Charing Cross Road, London, England, Great Britain1 Diagon Alley Daisy DodderidgeTomHannah Abbott[.....- ? TomHannah Longbottom née Abbott "This establishment of Diagon Alley the Leaky Cauldron is noted for its most excellent and delicious luncheon" — A sign in the Leaky Cauldron[source] The Leaky Cauldron was a popular wizarding pub and inn located in London. It was the entrance to Diagon Alley and indirectly Knockturn Alley. The rear of the pub opened up onto a chilly courtyard that contains the entrance to both alley ways. The pub was built by Daisy Dodderidge, the first landlady, in the early 1500s "to serve as a gateway between the non-wizarding world and Diagon Alley." It had a bar, several private parlour rooms, and a large dining room. To Muggles, the pub appears to be a broken-down old shop front on Charing Cross Road. This, however, was not the case prior to the imposition of the Statute of Secrecy and, in fact, prior to this, Muggle visitors were neither turned away, nor made to feel unwelcome. History "Some people argue that the oldest pub in London is the White Hart on Drury Lane; others that it is the Angel on Bernonsey Wall, or the Lamb and Flag on Rose Street. All of these people are Muggles, and all of them are wrong. The oldest pub in London, as any wizard will tell you, is the Leaky Cauldron on Charing Cross Road." — The pub is the oldest in London[source]The Leaky Cauldron was built in the 1500s by Daisy Dodderidge. The Leaky Cauldron was there long before Charing Cross Road was even planned; its true address is number one Diagon Alley, and it is believed to have been built along with the rest of the wizarding street. Created some two centuries before the imposition of the International Statute of Secrecy, the Leaky Cauldron was initially visible to Muggle eyes. While the pub was, from the first, a place for witches and wizards to congregate — whether Londoners or out-of-towners up for the day to shop for the latest magical ingredients or devices — Muggles were not turned away or made to feel unwelcome, even though some of the conversations, not to mention pets, caused many an unwary drinker to leave without finishing his or her mead. In 1692 with the imposition of the International Statute of Wizarding Secrecy, Minister Ulrick Gamp permitted the pub to continue its existence as a safe haven and refuge for members of the magical community. Though insistent on numerous concealment spells and good behaviour from all who used the pub, Gamp was sympathetic to the need of wizards to let off steam during this difficult time, and further agreed to give the landlord permission to let people into Diagon Alley from his backyard, because the shops behind the Leaky Cauldron were now also in need of protection. Out of gratitude, the landlord created a new brand of beer, Gamp's Old Gregarious, which tasted so disgusting that even with a one-hundred-Galleon incentive, nobody could finish a pint. Recent history "This is it — the Leaky Cauldron. It's a famous place." — Rubeus Hagrid introducing the Leaky Cauldron[source]The Leaky Cauldron has changed little over the years; it is small, dingy and welcoming, with a few bedrooms above the public bar for travellers who live a long way from London. It is the ideal spot to catch up with wizarding gossip if you happen to live a long way from the nearest magical neighbour. One of the most difficult times for the Leaky Cauldron was the creation of Charing Cross Road, which, had it gone the way it was initially planned to, would have flattened the pub. The Minister at that time, Faris Spavin, was certain that this was the end of the pub, and that it could not be saved. By the time he finished his seven-hour speech declaring this, however, he received a note from his secretary revealing that wizards had rallied, and through the mass use of Memory Charms had altered the entire route of the new road, leaving the architects confused as to why there was a blank space on the design, and why said space did not appear to the naked eye. In the summer of 1899, Albus Dumbledore and Elphias Doge stayed at the Leaky Cauldron, in preparation to depart for Greece, when Albus received word of his mother's death. In 1991, Harry Potter and Rubeus Hagrid passed through the pub on their way to Diagon Alley. Tom, the innkeeper, greeted Hagrid there like an old friend. This made it seem that Hagrid was something of a regular. Some other witches and wizards who were there at the time were Doris Crockford, Dedalus Diggle, and Quirinus Quirrell and they took a great interest in Harry, queuing to shake his hand. In 1992, Harry Potter and the Weasley family travelled to Diagon Alley by Floo Powder. Harry mispronounced "Diagonally", and therefore travelled to Knockturn Alley instead. After doing their shopping, Harry and the Weasleys departed through the Leaky Cauldron's fireplace to the Burrow. In 1993, as well as stopping there for drinks, Harry Potter stayed at the inn for a time, having accidentally blown up his Aunt Marge. He also met Cornelius Fudge in a private room for the first time. While the Leaky Cauldron was a favourite hangout for the magical community, its patronage took a turn for the worse in the summer of 1996, during the beginning of the Second Wizarding War. With Lord Voldemort and the Death Eaters moving in the open, many witches and wizards avoided public places as much as possible, including the Leaky Cauldron. When Harry Potter, Rubeus Hagrid, and the Weasley family passed through the Leaky Cauldron that summer on his way to Diagon Alley, they noticed that the bar was empty with the exception of Tom. On 1 May 1998, at the height of the war, Harry Potter, Ron Weasley, and Hermione Granger, with the assistance of Griphook the goblin, staged a break-in of Gringotts Wizarding Bank. While passing through the Leaky Cauldron on the way to the bank, they noted that it was nearly empty. Tom bowed in fear at the sight of Hermione, who was disguised as Bellatrix Lestrange at the time. At some point after the end of the Second Wizarding War, Tom either retired or passed away. Hannah Abbott then became the new landlady. Structure "For a famous place, it was very dark and shabby. A few old women were sitting in a corner, drinking tiny glasses of sherry. One of them was smoking a long pipe. A little man in a top hat was talking to the old barman, who was quite bald and looked like a gummy walnut" — The Leaky Cauldron in 1991[source]Located at 1 Diagon Alley, The Leaky Cauldron was nested between a Muggle bookshop and a record store. Inside the pub, it was dark and shabby, with a bar and a number of tables in the shadows of the corners. In stark contrast to the grubby downstairs of the pub, there were some unexpectedly pleasant rooms upstairs where passing wizards and witches could stay for the night. These rooms were reached by way of a handsome wooden staircase, and contained comfortable beds, highly polished oak furniture, a crackling fire which was always burning in the grate to welcome the visitor to their lodgings, and, in Harry's case, a talking mirror. Beneath the stairs leading to the second floor, was a second set of stairs leading to the basement. The latter come out on the right wall where two sitting areas containing red couch and chairs were nested in each corner on this side. The front wall had a stage with red curtains in front of a lowered viewing area. The back wall was blank, but the left wall had another red sitting area, and a bar. However, the basement, it seems, had been locked off for no apparent reason. Known rooms Private parlour was a room located behind the bar at the ground-floor. It had a desk, a window and a little table and two somewhat uncomfortable chairs. In 1993 Minister for Magic Cornelius Fudge borrowed the room so he could talk to Harry Potter about his safety and that he didn't have to worry about Sirius Black (who was thought to be a mass-murderer). He also told Harry that two men from the Accidental Magic Reversal Squad were sent out to puncture Marjorie Dursley and modify her memory after Harry lost control in Vernon Dursley's home, and that running away was irresponsible. Room 10 was a room at the first-floor. In 1993, the day maid was about to clean the room when its owner roared at her and closed the door. Room 11 was a room at the first-floor which had a bed in the middle, a fireplace, a talking mirror, and a window. In 1993 Harry Potter and his owl Hedwig stayed in the room after Harry ran away from Privet Drive and was picked up by the Knight Bus. - other rooms Dishes Dishes served at the Leaky Cauldron included: ==Beverages==Beverages served included:
