When I last wrote on General Electric shares (NYSE:GE) in early January, I warned investors to be cautious. And since then, stocks have gone from $12 to $6.7, for a loss of 44%. Source: Carsten Reisinger / Shutterstock.com None of my analysis had to do with the coronavirus from China, which was just emerging. But, of course, the world is very different now — and unfortunately, I still think that investors should keep away from GE actions. Strong leadership is not enough It is true that CEO Larry Culp has done a major job since he took the helm in October 2018. He is a proven leader who knows how to manage complex organizations. Keep in mind that from 2000 to 2014 he was CEO of Danaher (NYSE:DHR), who saw a five-time increase in stock value during his term. Culp's leadership combines the right mix of strategic vision and understanding of details. It is also a great believer in process methods, such as lean, which allow continuous improvement. Such strategies have their roots in the early days of Toyota (NYSE:TM). While all this will be useful, the fact is that it will not be enough. There are only too many serious issues facing GE actions right now. After all, before Culp entered the company, the company was live. GE posted more losses on the bottom line and there was a dividend sketch. In fact, the actions had to be erased by the prestigious Dow. Note that all this happened while the economy was doing pretty well. Now, Culpcertainly taken quick actions. He continued to cut costs and download various assets, such as from the medical business, to reduce the debt burden. But that probably doesn't matter much. If anything, Culp will need to take deeper actions — and fast. GE is particularly vulnerable as most of its businesses are cyclical, except for the health sector. As the world plunges into recession, the cash flows of the company will be under extreme pressure. Granted, GE should get $21 billion from DHR for the sale of its biopharmaceutical division. There are also about $35 billion in credit lines. In other words, GE should have sufficient liquidity. But there will still probably be losses in most of his businesses. The business of the aircraft engine is certainly in danger as the world travel arrives at a grinding stop. Boeing (NYSE:BA.) of course, has already requested a rescue of 60 billion dollars for itself and numerous suppliers. Moreover, even if GE has paid its energy assets, there is still exposure to this market. The company still has a 37% stake in Baker Hughes (NYSE: BKR.) Since the beginning of January, the shares have passed from $25 to $9.84 And the power unit, which has been recovered lately, will also be as deteriorating. Consider that the company was negative. The Bottom Line On GE Stock Back on March 4, GE has put off the road for its 2020 cash flows, which is expected to reach $3 billion, compared to $2.3 billion last year. But that doesn't matter.the coronavirus impact. And in the light of the wide closures of enterprises in the United States and in part of Europe, it is difficult to see how this forecast could hold. It is also important to note that GE's aviation business engine represents about 60% of industrial profits. Therefore, the subsequent quarterly reports could be pretty bad. So, at this time — with all uncertainty and high exposure to economically sensitive parts of the global economy — there is really no reason to buy in stock GE. From Charles Judd The electric panel of your house is the place where all electricity is distributed throughout your home. If you have problems with an electric receptacle somewhere in your home and cannot find the problem, it is possible that something went blank in the electric panel. With some care, you can easily check to ensure that the panel box is properly working. Inspect every break in the electrical panel to see if it is tripped. Visually check each to make sure the switch is set to the ON position. If you find one in the OFF position, this hammer has been tripped by aoverload or faulty circuit. Restore any switches inside the electrical panel. Do this simply by moving the switch to the ON position. If the switch immediately returns to the OFF position, you have a serious problem in your circuit. Contact an electrician. Test each single breaker with a multimeter. Switch the multimeter to the "Volts AC" setting. Each puzzle will have a terminal screw at the end where the hot wire runs. Tap a protrusion to the switch terminal screw and the other to the ground bar inside the electric panel box. If no power is detected, you have a faulty breaker that needs replacement. Repeat this for each break inside the panel. Turn off the main switch to the electric panel if you need to replace a switch. This is located at the top of the box in the middle of the panel. This switch will turn off all circuits within your home, then have a flashlight at your fingertips. Remove the defective switch from the electrical panel. There can be screws that hold this in place or it can be a breakup style. Make sure to replace this with an identical amperage breaker. Use the old hammer and remodel the new in its place, then install the switch in the electric panel box. Turn on the main current and test the new circuit. circuit. ge electrical panel schedule template. ge electrical panel schedule template pdf
