Sand is the most common abiotic factor in a desert. Deserts can have as much sand as the oceans have water. Although this unique type of soil does not provide the best home for most plants, it has a big impact on the way animals live in the desert. The sand withstands the extreme temperatures of the desert. Therefore, many animals that walk in deserts have a thick skin on the bottom of their feet so that they do not burn through the hot sand. The rock hyrax is an example of a desert animal with thick legs. When the wind blows the desert, the sand can damage an animal's eyes. To protect themselves from this, many desert animals, such as camels, evolved to have unusually long eyelashes. Sand also provides the perfect surface for some desert animals to move around. Several snakes are able to slide easily through loose sediment. Lizards, roadrunners and rabbits are also able to move quickly through the sand. Sunlight is not a living thing, but it also has a very big impact on the way plants and animals live in the desert. In most other ecosystems, sunlight produces heat during the day. Vegetation, moisture, and other abiotic factors help keep some of that heat in the atmosphere when the sun doesn't shine at night. Because there is little vegetation and even less water in the desert, this type of biome becomes very cold when the sun sets at night. To survive in the desert, living beings have to be equipped to withstand both the heat of the day and the cold temperatures of the night. Many animals in the desert survive the heat because they are fossorial, which means they dig into the ground. When it's too hot, they dig holes to find comfort in the colder temperatures underground. The wind is an abiotic common in most types of deserts. The climate is too hot and dry to withstand a lot of vegetation like other ecosystems. The little vegetation found in the desert is usually very short, with roots close to the ground to absorb so much groundwater underground possible. Therefore, whenever the wind blows through the desert, there are very few natural elements to slow down the speed of the wind. Wind at high speeds creates fierce dust storms. Deserts are known for. The rocks in the desert are directly affected by two other abiotic factors: wind and sand. The wind sweeps the sand through the rocks at high speeds, causing erosion. Most of the rocks in the desert are very soft or contain sharp crevices created by wind erosion. These unique types of rocks form homes for many desert animals, such as the rock hyrax, which hides from the elements in the corners and cracks of desert rocks. For animals and plants, water is perhaps the most important non-living thing in the desert. Although deserts don't get much water from rain, there are underground reserves of water in most deserts, and some plants have specialized roots to access that water. Much of the water in deserts also comes in the form of rock and fog. Animals and plants living in deserts have specialized organisms that enable them to live with less water. For example, camels have humpbacks that store fat and water, allowing mammals to go for long periods of time without having a drink. These are just a few of the most important abiotic factors in a desert, and there is a long list of abiotic factors that make up the beautiful desert ecosystem. These non-living beings have a great influence on the adaptations that plants and animals in the ecosystem have developed to survive. Photo Courtesy: @FriendsElderly / Twitter A senior facility can be a great option for someone who may need a little help bathing, eating or cooking, but still wants to maintain some levels of However, not all facilities are created equally, so you want to make sure that you select one that suits your needs (or your loved ones). These tips and questions will help you make an informed decision about where you or a special person will spend the rest of your years. Location matters, and not just for the scenery or the nearby amenities. If you plan to use Medicare for any portion of the facility's costs, your choices may be affected by state laws about how much medical care each facility can offer. Facilities can be expensive, and if your state's laws don't help, you may want to start looking for care centers in other states. Photo courtesy: @FriendsElderly/Twitter Installation size While more sociable people may prefer a larger installation with more residents to make friends, others may prefer the tranquility of a smaller establishment. However, more important than the size of the facility is the ratio between staff and residents. If you or your loved one need a moderate amount of help with daily chores or have major medical problems, a higher ratio of staff to residents means it will be easier to find help. You will also want to make sure the grounds are large enough for exercise and outdoor activities. Photo courtesy of @FriendsElderly/Twitter On-site services Although larger facilities tend to have more activities and other forms of entertainment, this is not always the case. In addition, what matters most is finding the right services for you or your loved one, not the number of them. Although exercise programs, canteen services, cleaning services, and medication handling are common, it may be harder to find help for dementia, Alzheimer's, or diabetes. Identify the services you need first and choose an installation accordingly. Photo courtesy: @FriendsElderly/Twitter Installation costs Medicare and Medicaid often don't cover a significant portion of the cost of assisted living facilities. Because of this, many and their families pay through a combination of personal finance, long-term care insurance or veterans benefits. Of course, you do not necessarily want to go for the least expensive installation, as it can be inadequate. It is courtesy: courtesy: Imagens opens the information that the facilities are willing to provide on their services is in this same, an useful knowledge to take its decision. Request talking to current residents, for example, reveals only what residents in question have to say, but also how transparent it is the installation itself. In the same way, if the installation does not allow you to inspect your license, it could be a sign that you have something to hide. Photo courtesy: @ FriendSelderly / Twitter Staff Mientras that the elderly residences always try to put their best for the outside world, the truth is that abuses at elderly occur. Because of that, it is important to consult the personnel policies of the installation and what protections you or your loved one will have at your disposal. You must find out if the installation performs criminal background checks and trains employees to identify and report abuse for the elderly. Other relevant questions include whether the license has been revoked to the installation, if the door locks are safe, if there are means and nurse on duty and if the residents have roommakers. You should also ask to see a recent inspection report if possible. Foto courtesy: [@ FriendSelderly / Twitter] Mu
