FossHub rating: five stars (105) Good microphone and a usb sound card recommended for the best recordings. The popular software for Audio Edition of Open Source Audacity is facing user "spyware" allegations for recent changes to privacy policies that suggest that the desktop application is collecting user data and sharing them with third parties, including state regulators, if applicable. Two months ago, Audacity was acquired by Muse Group, which has other audio-related projects, including the Ultimate Guitar website and the MusoScore application. According to FossPost, changes in the privacy policy section on the Audacity site indicate that several mechanisms for collecting personal data have been added by the parent company. The type of data collected now includes the of the computer, operating system and version, the IP address of the user, User, Any failure reports, fatal error codes and messages generated by your machine. More troubling may be the inclusion of a vague section listing data that should be collected "for legal, contentious application and requests from the authorities (if any). The storage of this data is located on servers in the US, Russia and the European Economic Area. For example, IP addresses are stored identifiably for a day before they are hashed and then stored on servers for a year, leaving users identifiable through government data requests. In addition, the new policy prevents people under thirteen years of software use, which is a violation of the GPL license that Audacity uses. Understandably, political changes have disturbed Audacity users, who have taken to Reddit and GitHub to question why an offline desktop application needs "home phone" at all, and there is already discussion about forking Audacity in a separate open-source project that is free from Muse Group's property and questionable data collection practices. Eine Sonderstellung nimmt das Tool Audacity ein, da es für die professionelle Verwendung konzipiert ist wie Schneiden, Hinzufügen von Effekten und die Aufnahme eigener Lieder. Damit kann man aber auch Spotify in Echtzeit aufnehmen. Ein Nachteil von Audacity ist, dass es Anfängern komplex erscheinen wird.
