group \Baa35; 1, while BE speakers tend not to break it. With regard to the group \soia352, both the speakers of the AE and the BE use tense forms passed in the speech reported after the verbs that belong to this group. Question: Does © share the same opinion regarding this observation, or is © me? Thank you very much for any comments, corrections or suggestions! Ladies and gentlemen, JXR © does it share the same opinion on this remark, or am it just me? It's © wrong to follow the rule. I advise you not to break it. As for your observation, I did not realize this, but it may be because, when I find the rule violated, my tendency (if I pay attention to it) is© correct it in my own mind. Your example phrases and your evaluation of them correspond to my intuition. But I think you're generalizing about groups of words. I can think of a few phrases using "saw" or "realized" that would be good without tense change. I don't know if they count as "reported speech," but ©'t see as the phrase 4 © reported. The reported knowledge that may have © through speech (but may not). Some examples I'm making up while I'm going. Yesterday I realized that John will call me when he's ready. Yesterday I heard John's wife had cancer. I heard yesterday that John will arrive on October 21st. Yesterday I saw that John would betray anyone who could. Yesterday I heard stacey will be on her way. Stacey told us yesterday that she'll be on her way. Yesterday I said you © taller than me. I thought yesterday you were taller than me. He announced last week that he would receive an increase in July. If you want a rule, © this: it will never be wrong to go back after, whatever verb you are using. However, if the conšÅ still remains in the future (NB "today" Å© a poor example because it can be past, present or future) then © often Not to go back. This applies especially to eternal truths. No reason I just made that "rule" up, so it's probably wrong. Consider your examples and replace "today" with "morning" to reduce ambiguities, which gives us: 1. John told us yesterday that we will call us when we arrive morning and this remains true. 2. John told us yesterday that he would call us when he arrived this morning, but his plans may have changed. 3. Yesterday we learned that John will call us when he arrives this morning and we still know that. 4. Did we know yesterday that John would call us when he arrived this morning? (...is to seems strange because it has conflicting knowledge with the dá³vida. Plus: 5. Archimedes said the upper limit of pi Å©/era 22/7. If you want a rule, © this: it will never be wrong to rewind, whatever verb you are using. However, if the conšåšo still remains in the future (NB "today" Å© a poor example because it can be past, present or future) then it is © often aceitable not to rewind. This applies especially to eternal truths. If I'm wrong, I©m wrong too, because I agree with it 100%. For me, both 1 and 3 work if John hasn't arrived yet, and 2 and 4 if he arrived. Thank you all for your valuable comments! We often speak of only two distinct categories ååååådirect speech and indirect/reported speech. Items with a function of pointing (deixis) are altered (present time to the past: next words changed to one's own words [eg'aquí'para'lÁ', 'agora'para'entÅto', 'amanãf'o next day']) Other have used the word "free indirect speech" representing an indirect category. The category "in between" occurs more often in speech and prose literal. I would see the backshifted versões (2, 4) as representing the stereotypical style of speech reported, and this © the version i usually use myself in normal situations.
